

Practical Conservation Volunteer Group Leader

Why we want you

Carymoor Environmental Trust is an environmental education and nature conservation charity based in east Somerset. We manage over 120 acres of wildlife habitats most of which have been created from the bare clay of a capped landfill site and which are home to a growing diversity of wildlife. We have regular conservation volunteering days but would like to be able to increase the number of volunteers. To do this we need people with some experience of working as part of these types of groups who would be happy to take on the role of group leader.

What's in it for you?

Are you looking to enhance your CV and develop new skills to help you start a career in Conservation? This role will enable you to gain experience managing both people and practical tasks. You could also broaden your experience of habitat management techniques and of the ecology of the species and habitats on our site. You would also be making a valuable contribution to developing the biodiversity value of our maturing mosaic of habitats.

You will be a valued part of our small team and will feel that you've spent your time doing something worthwhile. We would be able to provide you with a reference for any prospective employers.

The skills you need:

You will already have some experience as a conservation volunteer or may have completed some training in Conservation or Countryside Management. You will need to be outgoing and enjoy the company of other people and be happy to work outside whatever the weather!
